The full-size plaster models that represented the passage from a preliminary designing phase to the actual production of the marble sculpture were of great significance to Antonio Canova’s creative process. As the photographer Spina puts it, “[…] in the artist’s act of conception, plaster is the fragile, variable moment in which he perceives the body of his sculpture.” The plaster forms are not the finished works, and however they contain all their power and potential. The tiny bronze nails (repères) guide the photographer in tracing an unprecedented visual atlas and allow readers to lose themselves in unexplored landscapes of expressions and gestures, hairdos and drapery.

The close-up photo sequences expose the plaster surfaces and make it possible for the reader’s gaze to once again appreciate the bond between light and the pliability of matter that is one of the key features of Luigi Spina’s work.

As the subtitle emphasizes, the dimension of time proves to be one of the pivotal elements of the photographer’s research — working alone in the halls of the gipsothèque in Possagno. These “four tempos” are not a mere gimmick used to organize Spina’s visual musings throughout the four years in which Canova will be commemorated (2019-2022). The temporal dimension holds an unparalleled importance in the neoclassic sculptor’s creative and productive phases: the plaster artifact posits a before and an after. Before comes the preparatory study; after is the finished work. Plaster stands in between, it is central. Thus, this volume aims to introduce the general public to such a meaningful and simultaneously little-known phase in the creative process of Antonio Canova, one of the greatest sculptors of all time.
